Jacobs-Jenkins reframes Boucicault's play using its original characters and plot, speaking much of Boucicault's dialogue, and critiques its portrayal of race using Brechtian devices.[1] Jacobs-Jenkins considers An Octoroon and his other works Appropriate and Neighbors linked in the exploration of theatre, genre, and how theatre interacts with questions of identity, along with how these questions (such as "Why do we think of a social issue as something that can be solved?") transform as a part of life.[2] In a 2018 poll by critics of The New York Times, the work was ranked the second-greatest American play of the past 25 years.[3] Characters and casting Jacobs-Jenkins recommends the play be performed with 8 or 9 actors,[4] with male characters played using blackface/whiteface/redface, and female characters portrayed by actresses that match the characters' race.[1] BJJ - a black playwright who plays the characters: George - the white heir to the Plantation Terrebonne, a photographer M'Closky - an evil white overseer who plots to buy Terrebonne and Zoe Playwright - a characterization of The Octoroon's Caucasian author, Dion Boucicault who plays the roles of: Wahnotee - an Indian of ambiguous background, friends with Paul Lafouche - an auctioneer Assistant - Playwright's intern, to be played by an actor of Native American or South Asian descent, who plays the roles of: Pete - an older, loyal slave in charge of the house Paul - a pickaninny-type young slave Zoe - the titular octoroon. Development and production history Jacobs-Jenkins developed his take on The Octoroon while he was a Dorothy Strelsin Fellow at Soho Rep in the 2009/10 season.[6] An Octoroon had a workshop production at Performance Space 122 from June 19 - July 3, 2010, featuring Travis York, Karl Allen, Chris Manley, Ben Beckley, Gabe Levey, Jake Hart, Margaret Flanagan, Amber Gray, Mary Wiseman, LaToya Lewis, Kim Gainer, and Sashेर Zamata.[7][8] It was originally directed by Gavin Quinn of the Irish theatre company Fan Fan, but Jacobs-Jenkins took over the role after Quinn quit several weeks into rehearsals.[9] Prior to the first performance, Alexis Soloski for The Village Voice published an email from cast member Karl Allen who wrote, "the play has transformed from an engaging piece of contemporary theatre directed by Gavin Quinn to a piece of crap that wouldn't hold a candle to some of the community theater I did in high school".[10] Vallejo Gantner, artistic director of PS 122 along with theatre critics Elisabeth Vincentelli and Adam Feldman, argued that although it was not unethical to publish the email, it may not have been "nice" to publish it.[11] Mark Ravenhill staged a workshop production of the play featuring Saycon Sengbloh in April 2012.[12] An Octoroon premiered Off-Broadway at Soho Rep on April 23, 2014 and closed on June 8. Eventually, Zoe takes the poison and runs off. "Amber Gray on 'An Octoroon,' at Soho Rep". Directed by Sarah Benson, featuring music by César Alvarez (of The Lissps), choreography by David Neumann, set design by Mimi Lien, and lighting design by Matt Frey.[13] The cast featured Chris Myers as BJJ, in triple roles: the black playwright, George Peyton and M'Closky; Danny Wolohan as Dion Boucicault, Zoë Winters as Dora, and Amber Gray as Zoe. Deconstructions Through Brechtian elements such as direct address, Jacobs-Jenkins explores "the idea that you could feel something and then be aware that you're feeling it".[2] Melodrama Jacobs-Jenkins researched Boucicault heavily while working on An Octoroon and found an unfinished essay at the New York Public Library saying that theatre is a place for dramatic illusion—the most believable illusion of suffering—and catharsis. He is currently a Residency Five playwright at Signature Theatre and master-artist-in-residence in the Playwriting MFA program of Hunter College, City University of New York. BJJ clarifies that in the time of the play, a photograph was a novel/innovative/contemporary way for the plot to be resolved. ^ "2017 Results | Critics' Circle Theatre Awards". Obie Awards. Jacobs-Jenkins himself took on the role of Br'er Rabbit and Captain Ratts.[14] The production was critically acclaimed, winning an Obie Award for best new American play in 2014 (a tie with his previous play, Appropriate).[15] In his review for The New York Times, Ben Brantley called the play "this decade's most eloquent theatrical statement on race in America today." [16] The production transferred to Theatre for A New Audience's Polonsky Shakespeare Center in Brooklyn and ran from February 14, 2015 to March 29, 2015. Pete, George, and Dora acquaint themselves when Zoe enters to meet George. Present in An Octoroon is the illusion of suffering and actual suffering.[2] Jacobs-Jenkins also cites Peter Brooks' The Melodramatic Imagination as an inspiration for his approach to melodrama. ^ An Octoroon sohorep.org, accessed April 13, 2016 ^ Stewart, Zachary. Jacobs-Jenkins looks at the consequences of putting oneself onstage in their own work, if it is a real self or a fake self, which Jacobs-Jenkins embodied himself in the roles of Br'er Rabbit and Captain Ratts.[6] The sensation scene of the original play is deconstructed in act four. ^ "An Octoroon". M'Closky announces that Terrebonne is for sale and plots to steal Zoe; because she is an octoroon, she is a piece of property and therefore a part of the estate. Archived from the original on 17 April 2016. This led Jacobs-Jenkins to see doubles and pairs in Boucicault's play, through relationships between characters e.g. Pete is Paul's grandfather. Act V Zoe heads out to the slave quarters to ask Dido for poison. tickets.berkeleyrep.org. She is the daughter of George's Uncle and a slave. A photograph of a real murdered human contrasts with the original play's use of a photograph for justice.[4] Stereotypes By presenting characters in whiteface, blackface, and redface, Jacobs-Jenkins can look at "blackness and how to represent social constructs onstage that are so tied to a specific culture of nation." [2] This examination of race as a social construct is also in Appropriate and Neighbors. Paul—with the mailbags—stops to take a photo of himself with George's camera. Act III Minnie and Dido realize all the other slaves ran away. Following the act three climax: the moral is made clear, and the audience has to be hit with a "theatre trick" which overwhelms the audience with technical elements.
